Heroes and role models....

'All the best heroes are ordinary people who make themselves extraordinary...' (Gerard Way)

My family enjoys looking at old photos, particularly ones that include pictures of our family. The photos evoke memories of the times we enjoyed together.

In a recent conversation with a friend we were discussing what makes a hero. We reflected on our sporting heroes, movie stars and other 'larger than life' heroes. By the time our conversation had reached its mid-point we found ourselves drawn to the heroes in our own families and immediate circle of influence, those people who were indeed our role models.

Travelling through life can be a bit of a challenge, and it's natural to want to have some examples to follow, to help us through – especially the rough patches. Role models typically fill this need. Just about everyone knows that good role models are important for a child's development, but it isn't just children who need supportive role models.

One of the pillars of reflection is visualisation, because we learn that our mental images, for the most part, are what determine our reality. In other words, the way we see ourselves, and the world around us, is what decides how we will behave. How we behave determines, to a very great extent, what will happen to us.

Role models serve as living, breathing mental images that help us visualise the way we would like to live. They are touchstones, reference points if you will, that we can learn from and measure against, while we build the person we want to be.

What kinds of role models are best? No question about it, people we can actually get to know. You see, while it's helpful to read about an admirable person in a book or magazine, watch an inspiring life story in the movies, or watch successful people on TV or on social media, it is much more powerful when we actually interact with someone who shows us possibilities for ourselves.

When we can do so on a daily or regular basis, as we do with parents, grandparents, teachers and so on, this has the most powerful impact of all. As parents, it is helpful to remember that your kids will learn far more from what you do than from what you say. The best role models only need to set a good example. The kids will usually figure the rest out for themselves.

Consider this week what messages do we send the children of Sacred Heart?

'Not all heroes wear a cape...' (Author unknown)

Uniform Update
